During the 1st year the doctoral student puts together an educational plan whereby attendance to courses and other educational opportunities (i.e. seminars and conventions) are scheduled. This is done together with a tutor, who is assigned by the teaching body and is part of the teaching staff. The courses held by the teachers will give the students a common solid basis regarding:

1. knowledge and relative techniques within the methodological area (methodology research and data processing);
2. in-depth analysis of basic discipline linked to the study of knowledge representation;
3. acquisition of specific knowledge in the areas of cognition sciences, neurosciences, applied psychology, and the science of education.

The doctoral student has to attend the proposed courses in agreement with the Manifesto of the Doctoral Course to collect credits for the 1st year. Moreover, the doctoral student may ask the Head of the Course to account for their attendance to a course/seminar/convention at another place, whether national or international within the Doctoral Course. If it is approved by the Head of the Course, the doctoral student will have to present a report based on the course/seminar/convention attended, which will then be the topic of discussion in the talk at the end of the year.

The use of teaching/learning online is permitted. Participation to seminars, workshops and symposiums suggested by the department are also strongly recommended.

In the 2nd year, students attend national and international conferences, conventions, seminars and courses in agreement with the Manifesto of the Doctoral Course. In the second year, all enrolled students are required to spend a study period of research abroad for a minimum of six months. At the end of the second year Doctoral students present their thesis projects to the board, nominated by the teaching body.

The 3rd year is completely dedicated to the thesis. The thesis shall consist of a written dissertation in which students report their original research investigation, part of which can also be collaborative papers.
