Art. 3 – THE DOCTORAL PROGRAMME

The programme aims to provide the students with scientific tools for the analytic and critical study of every type of texts, both those traditionally recognized as literary texts and those produced in other cultural contexts. This general goal is specified through the particular aims of the two curricula.

The curriculum "Linguistics, Philology and Criticism" has the purpose of preparing the students to the analysis and the interpretation of modern, typologically different texts (produced starting from the Middle Age to nowadays; realized in different languages and even scarcely standardized linguistic varieties). To this objective various methodological and critical instruments will be presented and employed.

The curriculum "Greek and Latin Texts" has the purpose of studying the texts written in classical languages during the ancient, the medieval and the Renaissance period. This study concerns critical, linguistic, literary aspects of the texts and considers the context in which they are produced, the modes and the history of their transmission, as well as the strategies of their reception.

The research areas which are relevant to the aforementioned aims are handled according to a multidisciplinary perspective in order to promote a comparative study of the phenomena.

The doctorate offers several activities, which are listed in the courses' list at the beginning of every academic year. Specifically, the programme requires the students to take part in didactic and research activities for a total amount of 180 credits (120 for research, 60 for didactic activities). 120 research credits will be acquired by developing and writing the dissertation under the supervision of a tutor; 60 didactic credits (50 in the first year, 10 in the second year of the course) will be acquired through the participation in classes and workshops for a total amount of 120 hours.

The didactic activities - whose calendar and topics are specified in the courses' list - are articulated as follows:

- a. methodological courses in the specific areas of the doctorate;
- b. common courses on research methodologies and communication techniques;
- c. thematic and disciplinary workshops;
- d. tutorials for the presentation and the discussion of research projects;
- e. courses organized by other Institutions and Universities;
- f. conferences and meetings, organized both by the Department of Humanities in Trento and by other Institutes.

For each of these activities a certification attesting the attendance and the acquisition of the expected results is required. Didactic activities which are followed in other Institutes have to be authorized by the Coordinator, if lasting no longer than 6 months and by the Doctoral Programme Committee, if lasting longer than 6 months.

During the first year students should progress with their research project and should decide the general structure of the dissertation, which has to be approved by their supervisor.
