By way of indication only, and therefore without excluding the possibility of research in other areas not expressly listed, the PhD Course is divided into four main Research Areas:

“Pluralism, method and juridical traditions”:

Researches in this area relate to the studies on the identification and taxonomy of legal systems, institutions and rules that can be traced back to private or public law, and that would include, for instance, the critical analysis of structuralist and functionalist approaches, legal change, the relationship between different sources of the law, the role of non-State-originated rules, also in the light of roman and historical foundation of European law, and the use of comparative law in production and interpretation processes. At the same time, those analyses are intended to investigate the ontologic and axiomatic nature of the law, as they concern the juridical phenomenon besides national borders, both in a diachronic and in a synchronic perspective. A special degree of attention is paid to some crucial features of the jurist's work, as interpretation, argumentation, comprehension and problem-solving techniques. Besides, an interdisciplinary approach to methodological and substantive issues is appreciated, with a particular attention, when possible, to the dialogue with non-strictly-juridical disciplines, thanks to which it becomes possible to identify concepts and theories coming from different fields, thus developing epistemic abilities that would enable scholars to integrate different contributions relating, inter alia, to the anthropological and epistemological dimensions of the law.

“Market law, welfare and taxation”:

This field of research focuses on the analysis of the regulatory framework of the activities of private and public authorities at all levels, namely of the different and various forms of state intervention in markets and society to regulate, address, correct or favour the choices of actors operating at both national and European market levels. In this regard, attention is given to both the relevant public, private and criminal law aspects, as well as to the plural and multilevel framework, as well as the regulation of business activities and acts, also with reference to the agri-food supply chains.

Special attention is also paid to the analyses concerning, from a European and transnational perspective, regulated markets, corporate crises, the regulation of the individual and collective employment relationships, trade union law, social security and welfare law and equal opportunities regulations, as well as the analysis of the effects of political choices in the field of tax law and the taxation structure, without losing sight of forms and techniques for the employment protection in the labour market and in the individual employment relationship through private and public welfare measures.

“Fundamental freedoms, social transitions, and institutional settings”:

The topics pertaining to this area refer to public law subjects but also international and supranational ones, particularly in relation to the protection of fundamental rights, whose conceptualization is challenged by the current technological, social and institutional transitions and requires that the legal scholar pays particular attention to the preservation of (but at the same time adapts to new situations) the protection of the rights of the individual, even deprived of liberty, with a focus on the relationship between law, ethics, science, technology and with a focus on the instruments of protection such as the EU and the international jurisdiction, international criminal courts, administrative justice, civil and criminal justice. This area particularly includes research on the constitutional principles in all branches of law, the rights of the EU and third Countries' citizens, in relation to instruments for the protection of individual rights, including international ones. This area also covers research on the rights of peoples and of (ethnic, linguistic, and religious) minorities, as well as the protection of human rights in armed conflicts, without neglecting the relationship between the protection of economic and social rights, the protection of the environment and international trade obligations, the global supply chains, and investment law.

“Autonomy, guarantee of rights and protections”:

The research strands that can be ascribed to this area are those pertaining to the new instruments for exercising the autonomy of individuals, organisations, and institutions, be they of a public or private nature, as redefined in the context of the ongoing technological innovation processes and the pursuit of environmental, social and economic sustainability objectives, as well as in compliance with the fundamental rights recognised at the national and supranational level.

They are also linked to the study of the various liability systems in the private, criminal and administrative spheres and of the various forms of rights and interests protection, both public and private, individual and collective in nature, as they are affected by the profound transformations brought about by the processes of European Union harmonisation and by the dialogue between national and supranational courts, also oriented towards ensuring systems of protection marked by effectiveness and efficiency. The research topics in this field are developed with reference to the general doctrines of civil, criminal and administrative law and studies on their procedural dimension, as well as on the punitive power of the state, also in the light of the methodological tools offered by comparative law, covering the various phenomena in a European and transnational perspective, both from a national and international perspective, with reference also to alternative dispute resolution mechanisms, to the aspects disclosed by conciliatory justice and mediation and assisted negotiation practices.
